10-1-2008

Writing Sample

Xudong Hu

Includes "A SHORT CHAPTER," "TIBETAN MEDICINE" and "WRITTEN AT WATERSIDE."

Rights
Copyright © 2008 Xudong Hu

Recommended Citation
https://ir.uiowa.edu/iwp_archive/232

Hosted by Iowa Research Online. For more information please contact: lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
HU XUDONG
3 Poems

A SHORT CHAPTER

Nearly all afternoon, I sat on the long bench of the balcony of the second floor sickroom, gazing at the southern sky while a ball of cloud, beautiful as a snow leopard, gradually dismembered:
first its strong, supple limbs torn slowly by the wind, then its head cracked open by a plane.
When the spine was drawn out, and its twisted back collapsed, a sack of pulp and skin cast into a grove at the far end of Qinghua Gardens, I felt my own flesh like sand leak down between the bench slats until it formed a dune adrift in the deserts of disease.

TIBETAN MEDICINE

One day in a lunar leap year's April, on Barkhor Street in Lhasa, my father bought some Tibetan medicine, which on a starry night mother broke into chunks entrusted to a messenger for delivery to the chaos of the capitol. All summer, while my countrymen hawked popular events, and merchants scrambled for small trade, each day from its bamboo tube I'd draw one or two nuggets of this dark herb and dump it in a waterglass, still acrid, even chewed with sweet dates.
I swallowed this nameless tonic from a nameless realm, went to work, came home, saw good people, chatted nonsense, the herb sinking deeper into my flesh, calm as a heavy bell.
Then midnight came, as if someone small, dressed in black, delicately entered my forlorn liver, tolling the bitterness of life.

WRITTEN AT WATERSIDE

The source of this stream can no more be found than where its water goes after filling my spleen.
The flight of stunning things along the mountainside interpolates beauty's contours. I know so well how dragonflies with butterfly wings gracefully and subtly tease up the air's gorge and force the canyons to cry out their strained chill, though the force of memory draws water through slim tear ducts between rocks. I know so well how the wild duck of rippled light healing its wound in the water suddenly rises, leaving a patch of crystallized anguish.
So I
simply plunge into the water, clumsily swimming the sharp cold. First like a dragonfly nymph between the pebbles, dark and low, then as a fish spitting bubbles in a sunny morning yawn you slip under my skin: I begin to feel a distant air bladder: thus when you are hurt, it contracts, rolling my white, bashful belly up.
But
most of the time it's only like a sleeping lotus swaying in waves beneath my ribs, or a paper lamp burning above the water, guiding me to rise. When I'm light enough to surface, I discover the dragonflies have changed into sleep-shaped clouds, and I, lying on the surface,
am their cool, almost inaudible snore.
And you?
Are you hanging on my eyelashes? Can your "No" still cast itself into a string of birdcalls, scattered at evening across the whole mountain? Wind splays sunset across the water like a red fox flashes into woods. It's only now I see the waterfall from upstream flowing clear and bright, like your dazzling face rushing out from my body.

Translated from the Chinese by George O'Connell and Diana Shi Originally published in Atlanta Review, 2008 China Issue