1972

At Bablockhythe

William Dickey

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.1293

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
AT BABLOCKHYTHE

The ferry over the Thames had sunk, but a schoolmaster from Henley, red-eyed, a wild rose in his buttonhole took us across in his boat. He insisted that you row, that you were an American Indian, gently insisted (as he talked past us into some place that we could not see) that we stop for a drink with him, that we only listen.

We took the narrow path, pitted by cattle hooves, away from the river, while it began to rain, and found, almost in the path, a wild rabbit hunched quietly. He should have run, he should have been afraid, but his eye was gone. In the shock of that red furrow he ignored us, moving inward towards his dying.

I wake later and later, red-eyed, slack in these leaden long-dark mornings, try to pretend that desires and purposes will use up the day, but I lose things easily, almost as if I lost the idea of what connected me and them, now you have gone, over sea, into your own journey.