10-1-2010

Writing Sample

Albana Shala

Rights
Copyright © 2010 Albana Shala

Recommended Citation
https://ir.uiowa.edu/iwp_archive/321

Hosted by Iowa Research Online. For more information please contact: lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Instead of a tree

We share an inner garden into which we gaze from the edge discreetly.

An inner garden,
with untouched colours, with nameless trees, with cats we don’t dare feed, with grass we never cut.

Until the day the gale toppled the biggest tree in our garden.
A yellow flower burial.

Tears roll down.
We can cry now.
We can name the other trees.

Still from a distance, we can stare at the fallen trunk visited by the cats who take turns to sit on top with no need to cling, with no need to climb.

The view is open.
Survivors

I am surrounded by survivors with beautiful hands and hair swinging tall half - full bottles whom death revisits after having already knocked them out in a friendly match.

I hide,
entangled in your hair, breathing slowly,
chin over chest,
my neck exposed,
listening to the steps, the laughter, the spinning.

You don’t need to explain.
I understand.

The tree has only one branch, the one you sit on.
The river has only one bank, the one you stand on.
The road has only one pavement, the one you walk on.

I kiss you all in your uncorked mouths which enjoy food so much.

I buy you dancing shoes.
Yours is the floor.

I let myself float, pretending I have learned the rules, smiling wisely.
Java island, Amsterdam 2009

We live on an island with a borrowed name.

Two powerful young bridges connect us to the sleepless town.

The first rays of the sun warm up the people flocking to the bus station.

The morning wind wakes up the water, the masts of the boats tremble gently.

A transatlantic behemoth turns slowly and heads towards the sea.

Its horn blows twice.
The sharp-eyed seagulls dive, lightning in the ship’s wake, catching the fish that survived the night.

On deck peaceful men and curious women view with binoculars our sights.

One bag, a pair of shoes, a cup of milk, wet hair dripping, thin legs keeping to an inner rhythm little hands moving restlessly.
A boy.

You look through the window at the water I watch behind you unarmed as my gaze meets the behemoth’s.
The visitors wave us goodbye.

So many impressions will be chewed over breakfast.
You are tired and pleased, director of this golden and unambiguous dawn.
Life as fact.
Dancing to Bach

November is ending daylight is thinning grey matter thickens as in a perfect MRI

We blow candles together and dance to Bach everyday of your birth week

Time stretches like a cat dozes off near the fire one paw suspended Before it falls on the blanket I hold for both of us the order of the songs of the day the order of the films watched on YouTube the cut of the banana slice hidden between a piece of kiwi and a strawberry the white handled fork your short red vest your absent profile your legs crossed your cooing

All so simple and so complicated like the knots of the ribbons you like to wave

Time purrs and dreams playing with you one unintentional scratch on your cheek the only evidence of the game Coffee grounds

In a single act,
I am toppled over like a coffee cup locking in a piece of life, which does not match with the news of the day.

As the coffee grounds slide A fatal frieze emerges.
Chamber music plays.

Any effort to undo these acts will fail.
Life has to take its leisurely stroll before it surrenders me in a pram to the next judge.
In the Caucasus

In the Caucasus it happens that you do not see mountains they have been stolen in the night now they rise on a neighbour’s land.

In the Caucasus, the human rights activists play tamada. make a toast to the women and to peace.
None of them is self impregnable.

In the Caucasus, it happens that you shake hands with an ex-KGB, who talks amially about civil society and democracy.
He represents the rebel Ossetian minority.

In the Caucasus, it happens that you sleep in the same hotel with the nephews of the thousands deported by Stalin, like cattle, to far away Asia.
They are brought to see the land of their forefathers by German philanthropists.

In the Caucasus, a professor of sociology with liquid eyes, respectfully listens to the toastmaster and whispers softly in my ear: ‘We will drink again tonight... C’est la vie.’

In the Caucasus, they recommend you read Alexandre Dumas “Le Caucase” written 150 years ago, to understand the present.

In the Caucasus, everything is relative except the petrol haemorrhage In which absolute the old blessing and curse are mixed.
The bone

I woke up this morning to understand that I had dreamed about my bone once again in contention, in colour.

I dragged myself from cellar to attic pretending not to know where and when I buried it the last time.

I do not worship my bone but I cannot trade it for anything.
One's bone has no price.

I am not prepared to offer it either.
It is part and parcel of the old pack.
Small hours

I am listening to her voice wrapped in apple skin the boats start floating on the Amstel in the armpit of the open bridges sleepy doves knitted in filigree it’s a small hours classic.

Digital Pope

Let us choose another pope

A pope we will never doubt if he gazes with amusement at the nuns if he dreams of getting under the covers with cardinal X if he has betrayed the fatherland or his best friend fifty years ago.

Let us choose once and for all a pope with the latest software trustworthy reliable rechargeable painfree

A digital Pope.
Blue socks

Let me slide through the darkness,
the cold air,
the shiny lamps,
the icy platform, with red nose and frozen thoughts.

Let me be free of the words the many words, of the rhymes,
of the habits of poets, of the smoke,
of the softness of wine, of the foaminess of beer, the dripping,
the clicking,
the ticking,
the mocking.

I am gone.
I am on my way back to the doorstep, where two white feet greet me sleepily, in blue socks,
each with a letter on top.
KOSOVO 1999

On the menu of The Two Roberts the Russian salad has been baptised French both lack vegetables and mayonnaise.
Today the French took Mitrovica and the Russians the airport

Young guys from the villages make way for me at the bar of the first disco club in town since the war

Black leather coats smoked in burning houses even tonight will not hung behind doors.

‘Waiter! Let us celebrate the victory!’
On the drinks board is scribbled in chalk:
‘We prepare Molotov cocktails’ Map of atavistic desires

Let me go under your soft skin Ease the burn in your heart, filter your breath, dance in your veins
sit in your brain, hammer your DNA chain, implant your wisdom teeth scrub the dead skin from knee, elbow, heel, soul open all your dikes and flatten your dams shake up all the liquids of your body, and with this cocktail impregnate myself again, before the darkness falls into my eyes.
My blacksmith

Each time you come and go your hammer breaks through the reptilian links of my spine from underneath whispers beam upright into leaves their fragile necks stubbornly refuse to be dried into commodities.

Awakening

Crumbs in the bed, invited to inspect the battlefield.
Archaeopteryx

They say he was an archaeopteryx with heavy pockets full of coffee beans credit cards unanswered calls Sunday El País
and levi jeans

They say she was an archaeopteryx too with heavy socks full of lost bikes unpaid bills dried flowers in unread books long showers bread and cheese.

They saw a small round head in her front pocket as well

What they listened to was their wings' cry.

What they will listen to next has not yet been decoded.
Words

Words have left me like the passengers of the first class left the Titanic.

In small lifeboats the names and verbs depart: “love” “trust me”
On deck the pronouns remained stoical So too the adverbs, the exclamations: “Mine!” “Forever!” In the hold the conjunctions bang furiously on closed doors: “if”, ”whether”

In the distance a firework dies out like a sigh.
The water gurgles.
Measuring time

Shkodër, 2004

I unleash the day like a dog in the garden

When I call him he approaches me with lowered head waging his tail.

And he waits patiently.
While the water absorbs the sugar the bread soaks up the water and the clay pot is assured again that it is nothing more than water, bread and sugar.