The Rendition

Suzanne Buffam*
Outside the perfect solitude in which her child sleeps as though he were not born, a woman leans

her cheek against the open of her palm.

The sunlit curtain’s
satin, drawn.
Another early autumn

presses hotly at the glass.
Her eyes, down-cast, half-closed against the impulse to look up, to look

away, are focused on his face.

It is completely closed.
Behind the easel, History takes up her brush.

She adds a little color to the cheeks.
