The Poem Is Showing
Earnest Sandeen

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.1631
THE POEM IS SHOWING

Slowly, without embarrassment, the poem composes the candles on the sideboard to show how mortal our hands are, putting down or picking up a glass, fingerling among the hors d’oeuvres,
or touching a friend’s shoulder.

In the twilight of table lamps and floor lamps which the poem invents for the next room, how sadly our skeletons show through as we stand or sit, conversing with a certain animation.

THE POEM DRESSES UP LIKE LOVE

The poem contrives to look as old as love itself, Sappho in Merlin’s white beard.
It questions the glum lover: So how did your story end? I told her I was leaving her.
I couldn’t tell her I knew she was leaving me for her new lover. Your pride, was it?
(Stroking the beard.) My pride, yes. And besides I didn’t want her to hurt, even a little.

You ungrateful egotist, mutters the venerable poem, you could have left her a small gift of her guilt. What if she wants to remember you?

Earnest Sandeen