Love Notes from the Shiftless

Albert Goldbarth
As the universe travels outward so could a brick, inert in the sunlight passed through a window to a rubble-littered floor, explode; and the abandoned house for which it served as heart, assume the centrifugal shape and spin of a pinwheel, but a pinwheel we couldn't recognize in its enormity, the space between one pinwheel-unit and the next continually increasing as the house's hundred bolts shot through the air; and we could live, make love, and spend our waning days unknowing we twined limbs in the interval between two unseen quantums of a pinwheel-pattern expanding with ferocity through the cosmos; and the whole phenomenon, like any home-made bomb, innocently touched off by a heat no greater than this my erection in this your acceptance of it. And so there seems to be rationale for lolling, to do nothing but siphon the vapor condensing above a love-stained mattress—or, say, the meat deliquescing inside a peach—from somewhere out of you, into you, through you: as if, or maybe really, re-establishing osmotic balance in some neighborhood ecology. And on this block love works

this way, the deep kind, no fireworks; but the passive opening onto luminescence, lax to take and give light, charged not like a battery—like a hole drilled long ago in a board nailed, longer ago, to a roseate eastern exposure.
