This

Stephen Berg
THIS

It's dark by five.
My neighbors are cooking dinner,
they drift in front of their windows like souls.
Sparks pop out
over the chimneys,
a splinter of moon leans towards the hushed street, stars begin.
I have a book translated from Hebrew that says "You see our faces from the dark, and You know we won't forget You."
I don't understand it. I love it.
Nothing is what we are,
God's not what we touch at the end of each day for comfort, so tired we can barely speak, bitter because we did not see Him.
A squat white candle gutters inside me.
Who put it there?
My street ends at the river a few blocks from here.
The moon sits high beyond the houses and the stars, flung everywhere, are whose?
I don't want to think about these things anymore, they don't help anyone.
Bread, meat, a glass of ice cold water, sitting down with the paper,
this—
I'm stretched out naked across myself in a barbershop, my groin torn off, one of the bodies is so thin—a dream.
Voices from a book old Jews memorize, sacred, incomprehensible, break in.

11  Stephen Berg