Chatting with the Builders

Marin Sorescu

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.1998
And yet somebody is breathing, breathing there above my bed.

Who knows what star is burning out somewhere, far away and thanks to the odd system of reflection of things its soul is now breathing on my wall.

Tomorrow I shall have to put a frame there too.

_Translated by Roy MacGregor-Hastie_

_Chatting with the Builders_

_In the Style of Constantin Abățutea_

Give me a brick.
See, I will insert it into a poem, even in its foundations, right where gravity riots.
Give me another one. Give me another, this one has cracks.
(A crack in a brick is the root of junking; let's be all eyes when it comes to cracks).
See? With your help, the help of the plumb line, the level, the winch and the tackle, the bulldozer, prefabs, scaffoldings, and the manual on material stresses, poetry grows; and grows, comrade builders.
This is going to be a poem about as useful as a brick. Maybe more.
It's going to be like two bricks wedded to each other with the ring of the builder's mortar.
It will be a poetic tower, or, if you wish, a poem
w/ self-service.

Give me another brick.

Translated by Stavros Deligiorgis

---

TAMURA RYUICHI / JAPAN

Four Thousand Days and Nights

For the birth of one poem we must kill we must kill many we must shoot, assassinate, poison many beloved.

Look, simply because we wanted the trembling tongue of a small bird from four thousand days and nights we shot the silences of four thousand nights and the backlight of four thousand days.

Listen, simply because we wanted the tears of a starving child in all the rainy cities, the smelting furnaces and midsummer wharves and coal mines we assassinated the love of four thousand days and the pity of four thousand nights.

Bear it in mind, because we wanted the fear of a stray dog who sees what we cannot see who hears what we cannot hear we poisoned the imagination of four thousand nights and chilly memories of four thousand days.

To give birth to one poem