The dead pots hump in corners around the shack. No music here but the music of white bone drying beyond water in sun.
Late August. I bring back distant summers—the air of memory, the distal air of avatars mixing water and mud, clay the admixture of sky and earth.

A few miles away the sea wind moves, sweeps salt in sheets over birds.
I sit now on the grey wood of the kiln’s benches. It is bright.
The salt, like birds, hovers and then moves on. I have never been here.

I’ll leave no bones still pink with flesh or blood. There are no bones to leave.
There are no thoughts to leave. Only the mind runnelled like earth, dry and bare as the limed earth, nothing but the wet flesh of memory.

Four Days of Your Death / Jack Myers

In memory of Irving Cohen

1
At the other end without a body no one believed in his death.
It got larger like the blackness of a pupil in the dark until it soaked up all the light to fill his form.
The casket stands for character: stained, unvarnished hardwood holds the irrefutable fact best.
The rings of hardwood ripple outward like a flat scream the body lies in.

Memory has senses that the dead can use.
The hand that taught us how to touch now feels like the wind of a man passing.

The family gathers together like so many presents to each other.
It is the middle of winter, the time of the tree cut down.

From the Blind / Paul Nelson

I lace them together carefully, the pine boughs under the bank at the tide's edge, hiding the milking stool, the cheesebox shelf where my shells are stored, the root that loops once to hold the bottle.
There is a downed spruce that fits the arches of my feet above high water, and in the dark I crouch there with my stomach full like a fat child peeking at his sister, waiting for gratuities to wing in, whistling, shush down and splash in the thin pond that makes itself each twelve hours of my life.
Sometimes, cradling the big ten-gauge, I imagine my body loafing in the marsh like a pulp log, a new occurrence, the man who stepped off the creek bridge in April 1886, or the girl who followed him by eight decades, my mother's sister's girl, talked about, pearl of a girl,
