The Fish Barn

Dave Smith

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2108

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
otherwise a loaf of white bread rising on her own existence, a stranger in the town.
It's a fine place to hunt ducks, and that's the worst of it, crouched, ready for the light to let me see how many are sitting with the decoys, will jump into the air when I rise like Jesus to blow them down.

The Fish Barn / Dave Smith

Raw nuggets of croakers cleaned in the wind, trash-hearts flipped on a lace of snow. Prisms. Rubies.

Always cats, but you couldn't catch one because they, before Christ, were wild, oh yes, and would come even before the fish in barrels fell, some of them, still flopping and you might have been one of the ones saying if a man could have a coat out of those hides, why then he would be a rich sucker inviolate as a cat that never thinks of weather, maybe, and slick decks would turn safe as heaven.

If you were that man you'd every fall would end up right.

Backed to the fire, you'd throw out the meat quick-freezing, sugary with snow as if battered to fry, glistening, a jewel watched from both sides.

But you couldn't catch the wild cats who used to come here, silent as nightmares, all sizes ready to snatch the least living thing, eyes full of the fire from barrels, all you ever saw. Those coming when there was no more reason, too, since the fish petered out, shards of the family line shattered like the gritty glass from the barn's busted window. What good did it do to name what never once answered or showed a face until the guts were given, laid out on the white bed dainty, delicate as scales you can still see?

If you can answer that, do you know why they loved best the blue, stunned eye grieving for the shimmer of sea-depths, thumb-plucked like bait?

And why do you ache, returned to this half-way house, for what crouched, invisible, to eat blue eyes as if that translated a way to stay alive? Or if not that, at least, to see how a dark thing hungers.

Captain C. F. Hoyt (1826-1889) / Donald Hall

"In mid-August, in the second year of my First Polar Expedition, the snows and ice of winter almost upon us, Kantiuk and I attempted to dash by sledge along Crispin Bay, searching again for relics of the Franklin Expedition. Now a storm blew, and we turned back, and we struggled slowly in snow, lest we depart land and venture onto ice from which a sudden fog and thaw might deliver us to the providence of the sea.

"Near nightfall
I thought I heard snarling behind us.
Kantiuk told me that two wolves, lean as the bones of a wrecked ship, had followed us the last hour, and snapped their teeth