These Untitled Little Verses in Which, at Dawn, Two Obscure Dutch Peasants Struggled with an Auburn Horse

Norman Dubie

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2118
These Untitled Little Verses in Which, At Dawn, Two Obscure Dutch Peasants Struggled with an Auburn Horse / Norman Dubie

The water is green. The two boats out at a distance Are silver, and the two gulls coming in

Off the water are, also, silver;
But these peasants and their horse, at first light,

Seem absorbed in the pitch-blackness
Of a previous night. They are in a field

That climbs away from the sea joining
A thick row of white almond trees.

The younger of the two men holds a small branch,
The other

Holds a rope that leads away from the horse
Running over his shoulder and underneath the arm

To a pool of rope beneath him: he leans,
Or he reclines like a lever in the scene.

The auburn horse
Represents some inevitable sadness

That will visit each of us, that visits
These two peasants struggling in a winter pasture.

It is the morning.
It is dawn. These three may

Signal a common enough passage from the night
To the day. It begins like pain for the older man:

It begins to rain.
The two men run to the trees just above them
And the horse, ignorant of everything, walks away
Like a skilled butcher from a dark, maimed Lamb still wiggling in the grass behind him. And Morning surrenders to mid-day, and the afternoon
To the evening, and the evening surrenders everything
To the sleep of these two peasants
Who have had a discouraging day in the fields:
They dream of the black, burial horses of a king
With heavy sable plumes and the blinders
Of gold-leaf made starry with diamonds,
Horses not like the auburn mare who stood
In a world that Belongs to a system of things
Which presents a dark humus with everything Living: all of us preceded
Not by the lovely, braided horses
Of which the peasants dreamed, but by these two Peasants and their horse struggling
Briefly, at dawn, in the deep trenches
Of a field beside the green, winter sea!

Premonition / Mark Jarman

Mother, I see you blocking the door, your skin is a mesh of light letting the night through, your breasts are no longer toylike as in the bath, they are cones of moonlight tipped with darkness,