Three Admissions

Howard L. McCord
all around the black. There is some small bleating from the calves and the cows’ nostrils flare only once more, or twice, above the dead dry metal troughs. No more fat tongues worrying the salt licks, no more heady smells of deep green from the silos rising now like huge twin chimneys above all this.

With the lofts full there is no stopping nor even getting close: it will rage until dawn and beyond,—and the horses, because they think they are safe there, run back into the barn

which is burning. . . .

Three Admissions/
Howard L. McCord

Everything the fox knows is kept in a stone at Axum.
Small, but hard to move.

The horse comes at night to peer in my window,
his eyes white and quiet as empty coffee cups
on a kitchen table.
He watches till just before sunrise,
then walks away.

I drink in the afternoon,
and learn strange words.
A bar—without drunks—
is the only corporate body I do not find contemptible.