stretches forever. The heron erects a long body, standing to see, and the blue whale tests the ocean and finds no limit to its buoyancy.

In this true world the jay blurs itself in flight; the wind blots the sharpness of the pine. The artist, pausing at the wall, finds his shapes already leaning, the long wolves stretched by the tension of the chase, the great square ox expanding, fleeing on its spindly legs, acquiring by its speed the body of fright.

Landscape with a Woman / when shadows climb out of the desert up the sides of mountains and violent birds pass like projectiles on their way home for the night I say I have given you everything it was all I had when darkness rises to the tops of saguaros and a river of cool air begins to flow down the arroyo I say I have given you little it was all I had

31
when the moon sits on top of the Santa Ritas then levitates becoming smaller and more pale as it goes I say I have given you nothing it was all I had but you do not listen you go on into your losses without birds without mountains or shadows or the moon you look into yourself and say it is not enough it was never enough

New House / Diane Ackerman

We bought a house hand-me-down and complete, packed with all the gear family life engenders: cameras, clothing, junk and antiques, vibrator, bowling ball, pans and glasses.

Every knick-knack knows gossip I have no right to, about a Mr. Norton who lived, bred, and boozed there.
I'm told he died of gluttony in middle age, towards the end bloating like a pufferfish.

Now suddenly I've acquired someone's life, as if it were a fondue-pot or a hedge-cutter. His initial still rules the hall linoleum.

There are mortgages and taxes and a pool to skim daily, poison-ivy to uproot, grass to mow, doors to lock. And me with no steady job guaranteed.
