Walnutry

Robert Morgan
for the summer at me, the yield from digging holes and tying strings, lugging hampers in the mud with heat rash, stings and blisters. In my room I’d sit with dirty feet and sweat-ripe skin on the clean sheets and unwad the damp bills to press in stacks like pages of a ledger of the hot days, the green and gray ink more lasting than sunburn or callouses, and telling of my labor with a one-eyed lit pyramid. I collated and banded the leaves in bundles and counted out the coins like next year’s seeds into the old tobacco pouch.
That consecrated metal was an abstract drawn off the soil and sweat and cast into a jewelry of value.
I meant those struck emblems to act as compact fuel, like nuclear pellets, to power my long excursion out of the sun and beyond the ridges, and put them all in a paper box above the closet door to trade later, the young summers become signs to be translated again into paper, ink and paper, in the cool timeless leisure I saw while washing my feet on the back steps and spitting melon seeds into the cricket haunted dark.

Walnutry / Robert Morgan

When walnuts grew in stands like oak or hickory in some mountain coves and the timber market lay over trails and feisty creeks, some cut their big nut groves the same as pine, and sawed out planks for porches, barns, even hogpens.
With never stain nor varnish they took the weather for a century, growing stronger, like cement.
The seasoning took twenty years.
They didn't need the meat as long as there were chestnuts.
Where the cows had rubbed Their stalls shone like mirrors.

Rainy Sundays in late fall my father took the egg basket out to the walnut in the chicken lot and gathered half a bushel. The hull ink tanned his palms.
Inside he set them on the hearth and peeled the sooty rinds off into the fire. They censed the house with raw fumes. He sat there all afternoon on the warm rock cracking with his mason's hammer, holding the shells on end so they split clean, working careful as a sculptor to get the little figures of meat intact from their molds, and dealt the pieces to Sister and me for hours while rain flared on the windows and burst in the fire compacting brighter on the diet of shells. That night I'd throw up the oily seeds gluttoned all evening, and remember again the ground under the big walnut purged bare by the drip and dissolution of the tree's powerful bile.
