Snowlight / Robert Morgan

Grandpa knew for certain it would snow if he went out early to grind his coffee in the back porch mill and saw the glow behind the mountain steady and close as lighted cities.
He thought snow an electrical condition of the air, a discharge like St. Elmo’s fire on the high peaks that spilled down and coated everything with angelic smuts, fleshing the limbs of a dead pine so they smoked and flared in the early sun, giving body to the light after its long descent to corposantly suffer weight among the branches.
Stirred by shadows on the sun and currents in the ground the aura signalled its approach.
Before evening we’d see the wind charged and wrestling its host of sparks.

The Flying Snake / Robert Morgan

The giant rattler that lived in the rocks above the Gap Road watched teams and passing riders from its summer ledge, almost invisible in moss.
If bothered it could drain its black feet into a crevice or, provoked, spring on horse or driver, raking the neck with its loaded fangs and flopping off
