Making a Door / Dennis Schmitz

a weedy creek peeled from corn fields, the whole countryside where I grew up thaws from the front

windows of this dollhouse we are making together.
my daughter kneels
to chalk night on the back windows wanting for this one house all that our family lived her eight years
even dreams contorted
to the neat minimum

of her bedroom.
I ask to enter the doll’s world, tell in altered size what I dreamed in my half of the house:

how I reached speech through a series of dahs, made my face a welt on the five senses—I go on distributing myself over the assigned parts the house is almost done

I hand her the saw

It Is Still Winter Here / Linda Pastan

I need no thermometer to tell me—the rhododendrons are enough,
