with a rose-like tutu and a glazed pink smile.
She has risen as far as the ceiling, near the resting place of the chandeliers.
From the dirt you can tell it is taking place in an important city.

The audience does not panic or move though a girl is hanging above them.
Do they think it is part of what they have come to see?
Their faces turn upward, rose and white.
The dancer, her eyes closed,
does not stir.
She thinks she is dreaming a dream, probably,
in which she has floated away from the earth.
When she opens her eyes and sees that she hangs there at the center of a real proscenium at the ceiling like a lost balloon will she be startled, fulfilled or terrified?
Surely she has never attained such elevation, and will have to consider all over again how to cope with what it is possible to do.

Person Smoking / Daniel Halpern

Cigarette smoke floats up to this second story room.
It doesn’t mean too much,
but it is a sensation.
Below me someone sits quietly.
There is no reason to believe it is a woman, and there is no way I can look out the window.
I imagine a woman sitting on a bench smoking quietly, looking off into the trees. I could of course call out, but that would be ridiculous.
I wonder, as I stare into the trees,
what she is thinking about.
She can't know I'm here and wouldn't care if she did.
She sits there as I sit here.
And then she laughs.
Startled, I turn back into the room. She watches me from the bed, smiling gently—at what, I wonder.
Her cigarette is a gray ash that drops into the white air of the sheets.

Distant Faces / Daniel Halpern

Sometimes at night
I go out to the terrace lit by red neon
that vibrates the still air.
I lie down on bricks
whose coolness calms me
and remember those who have left for cities in the west,
or the midwest,
or for nowhere at all.
After a little I go back in,
and in sleep call back
those familiar faces.
Or else I remain on the bricks and press to my body
the coolness that keeps those who have left me
so distant, so far away.
