The Ewe

William Heyen

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2316

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
The Ewe · William Heyen

Ropes to her hind legs and the elm’s branch held her just above the ground in silhouette.
I’d almost run into her, but veered away in time,
and now knelt out of range of her bulbous eyes, her cavernous ribcage.

I was alone, stared, and the dead ewe, plane of silver flesh and flesh-shadowed bone flamed into light, flew downward into the ground, and disappeared. When, from this other world, she rose into silhouette again,

I crawled closer, as I remember, looked up into her eyes, and entered. . . .
And last night, kneeling within a dream under her eyes again, I entered, and here, in this cave of silence, at the poised center of being, in the ewe’s skull, I received her light, but the human power of color, the sunset lavenders, the moon-silvered meadow,

the curved sledge burst with stars.