Modern Dance Class

Stephen Dunn

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2321
Modern Dance Class · Stephen Dunn

The difficulties of grace.
How first the body must learn the elementary extensions, the possibilities it knew as a child, unnatural now—wacky as obedience lessons for a cat.
The instructor looks at me the way gas station attendants look at tires whose treads are gone; I imagine he's thinking “Oh get a new one, a man could die with a body like that.”
I know grace is what occurs after technique has been loved a long while and then forgotten.
So I take the steps,
I reach as far as I can reach.
My thighs are muscled from sports in which opponents were other than myself, my arms have no history of holding themselves in air without bringing something back.
But I remember a fat girl whose grace was the loveliness with which she carried her burden.
I knew a stutterer whose poems were sailboats and wind.
But I'm neither good nor driven, I just want to be magnificent as if by magic the way a teenager does.
By now, the instructor has turned his head, I'm his toad among butterflies, he can't bear to look.
I'm so wrong for this in my leotard
I'm thinking my cock is a nipple under a wet blouse, everybody's staring at it, my balls are Christmas for the loneliest person in class.
Soon he calls it a day, says "practice or stuff it" and walks off.
I dress slowly, thinking how much better I might have said that.