The Tennis Player
Kent Nelson

"Spare but psychologically incisive short stories in which personal crises, often vague or mysteriously unnamed, are resolved or acknowledged. Aging athletes, insomniacs, and young people who have reached a middle-age crisis ahead of their time are among the characters who purge their psyches in these often poignant confrontations with one's self." — ALA Booklist.

A Horse of Another Color
Carolyn Osborn

Osborn writes about young wives and old, real cowboys and imitation ones, teachers who are still learning their lessons and some who prefer not to learn them. Her ability to perceive the incongruity in any situation makes her humorous stories among the best. "The stories . . . are perceptive, often funny, and eminently readable." — Texas Monthly.

One More River
Lester Goldberg

"In thirteen fine short stories, Goldberg probes his Jewish past amid a cast of losers so painfully ordinary that they become memorable. The Jewish kid working in the pig slaughterhouse, the factory worker deliberately burning himself as the Rosenbergs die, the mugged good Samaritan scribbling checks for worthy causes — Goldberg's people combat the overwhelming contradictions of their lives with small, defiant gestures." — Kirkus Reviews.

The Pleasures of Manhood
Robley Wilson, Jr.

Wilson's stories have been published in such magazines as Fiction International, Antaeus, and Esquire, and in several anthologies. He is editor of North American Review. Wilson's special talent is in creating fantasy. This collection includes stories about a girl who has an affair with an apple and a vacationing family's search for an elusive ocean. "This is fiction at its best." — Stephen Minot. "A splendid collection of stories." — Publishers Weekly.
