Starlings · Laura Jensen

Outside the window, at the top of a chimney, two starlings are bathing in soot. In a flock they grind away at the grass, fly away like wagons with sticking wheels. How they make their presumptuous wishes, what they practice in solitude must be therapy, concord, and sleep.
They hang there in some indifferent tree, dream their boring dreams which they consider luminary.

They have always just-sprung from some horn of plenty, they hop like rabbits, like a gang of kids. As they pound up to the trees they are like a veil trailing, a veil you pray beneath.
They are like prayers for the lifting of that veil. They are not beautiful.

It is cold. I lean at the radiator.
In one of my panes of glass, a man fills his birdbath, the stream of water glitters all this way to the other side of the street.
They might bathe, they might bathe forever and be yet speckled, gritty, holy only by name. They bear their stars crudely, yet believe me, they are Earth’s creatures; suet and seed are cool and good.
