The fathers

May 3, 1851 Macune, Missouri

They recede from here like straight fence that gives the land both sides, like the bodies of men who settled Missouri, Kentucky, western Virginia. As young men, each one saw the land left to him, & every time he looked he heard all its stories, the early frost & the luck of rain, the child who died & his own fever passing.

One night John leans against the table whose every mark is the light it was made in, his father glaring out at weather, making the boy feel like weather. When it lifts in the sky the father thinks the boy’s soaring is what he was looking for all along.

When John thinks what can’t be taken with us—how the table is too much bulk for any wagon—the unspoken skies of California, its unexplained ground is what he wants. The travel.

Evidence

August 27, 1851 Macune, Missouri

John says, It’s darker & darker here, tearing off another hunk of bread, making a meal of it. It is like all the loaves I’ve ever baked or will, but for him it is soured in thin light, from each detail of his day the shining’s been skimmed off like cream.
The cow’s dull eye is evidence, the meager crop a witness so simple it argues sing-song, rhymes no with go, & when the field turns wily it mutters foe into the wind.

If I say what I feel he’d hear it in tongues, a warning against women carrying babies turning in them. The evangelist’s tent was never fuller than John in the stubbled field, John filled with what moves him.

Sara

November 9, 1851 Macune, Missouri

What is strange is in my arms, the darkness I could not sleep in came from me blue & shaking with a cry above her size, & though I had no milk for days she sucked hard, tugged at the nipple, & we were one animal pulling itself along, hearing its own labored breath as the world’s hummed coax to thrive.
We’ve travelled this way two weeks & still there is nowhere to go but into the splash of her iris, the color of a tunnel that turns to light where it opens again far away.
Making ready
April 27, 1852 Macune, Missouri

I sang while I packed as if I were in the woods, telling the bear I’m on my way & mean little, a bouquet, wildflowers for the table.

I topped the last crate with a hymnal, put all those songs in the dark with jars of seed, forget-me-nots and sweet pea, one chopped clump of rose, roots bound in burlap. I named them flute, vilin, drum.

Then I remembered my book of pressed flowers, the passenger that prepared, lighter every day, the hyacinth just a blue powder held in place hovering above its stalk.
The voice.

My father 3 days before we leave
May 3, 1852 Macune, Missouri

As a young man he’d taken us his far way, when I was a baby, my mother the age I am now.
He told her then, A grandfather is an old man & that says it all.
Kentucky & fathers that held him down we rolled away. It was simple travel, a line you could make on a map.

Now Papa’s come back to it wearing the mask of age to hear the breath-like rightness of adventure in a young man’s hurried speech, to hear the babbling of a baby girl who tangles her hand in the mystery of her grandfather’s beard.
He must have promised silence to be allowed to see this again.
The preacher at St. Joe May 9, 1852 St. Joe, Missouri

There was no confusing him with the sinner who fell drink-heavy near the front, there where the preacher pointed down, finger shaking as if its blood were lightning, with wrath for every meek inch of earth it struck.

That man is no emigrant, brothers, sisters.
His soul has already settled, squatter's rights in hell, he's got.

Then that preacher remembered gold, the tons of mud & gravel he'd sluiced for a wealth of dust, the refined heap a man can carry in one sack.
He puffed up, straining the seams, he stomped the stage & sweat mightily, but he couldn't bring that finger back to poke his own little pile, he couldn't shut up. And so, as I've done before for so many men, I was silent for him.

Seeing my sister
June 3, 1852 South Fork of the Platte River

Across the Platte she waved her bonnet, & the setting sun behind her sent a shadow over the slow water, each pass of her arm a darkness crossed over me, & then the red sun.
For a moment I thought it was rising, that we were crossing to the other side of things.

But the sun did fall,
& between Lucy's shouts I heard her baby cry, saw her dress splotch dark with milk, & then she rushed to their wagon.
It can be pulled from you just like that. Behind you darkness has been gathering & you’re wet before you remember the milk spills for that cry. Then you hurry in your own time while men linger over horses, search out matches, & call to you, calling your name long, as if you were on the other side of the river, as if calling to the ferryman.

June 9, 1852

A line from Missouri to the Rockies runs through my heart & shakes, a string drawn taut until it hums, the song that trembles in my throat when I cook or mend or wash dishes in sand. I dream of dragging a bow across our trail, playing a note so low John puts his ear to the ground to hear it. A horse, he says. Or something about to break the surface & still so far to go.

At Ft. Laramie

I counted sacks of flour, tugging the seams looking for strength & I wondered how far the rice would go. John said we only need food to get there. Tending to these things makes loving the man in my arms at night like eating, the surplus & the wanting, the growl of a stomach that won’t stop working, empty of all but its own juice.
For each thing the wagon can’t hold, for each thing abandoned to ease the oxen’s pull, my mind swells to hold that much more. In this world there is something wrong with love, as its weight is what’s wrong with the china closet we left behind.
We placed it facing east as I insisted, between the ruts. Let the next train roll through its doors. I opened them wide & thought of every yes I’d ever said to John.
