As If

Lawrence Raab
As If · Lawrence Raab

It isn’t as if you had to sit there in the grass, watching whatever it is you would say you are watching.

Some flowers. The daisies, the others whose names you never learned.
Or the birds, the bluejay and robin.

It isn’t as if you had to feel this way.
The stem of the daisy is slender and pale, furred with jagged little leaves.

The frill of petals, of course, is white, and reminds us of who loves us, and who does not.

We’d all rather be happy, wouldn’t we? You just aren’t sure if remembering the names would help.

The oak and the elm and the willow.
And the other people you can see who are so busy with their lives, it isn’t as if you could be certain they are happy, it isn’t as if you could ask them, mentioning only the weather, how it is likely to change by evening, how it is likely to remain the same.