These Small Songs

George Keithley
These Small Songs · George Keithley

Suppose we are unaware of time passing.
And all our hours are expanded passing into time. Let it seem so. Soon, it’s summer. This green evening strung with cicada song.

A boat droning
across our violet sleep.

Let it seem to. We’ll wake and walk into a warmer morning.

We are passing into time. If only on the stoney shore where we are.

Where pines will hold one pose hour by hour
against an unblinking glare, their rare restraint visible since noon in that reflective light in which they lean toward dusk when a blue sun floats over Rock Lake and noiseless they dive.

Splash-

less shadows lengthen, swimming far from shore.

Swimming their darkness over the water not like a leaky net drawn by a droning boat. More like night itself which catches and holds the soul's attention. Utterly still but for the boat. And these small songs the cicadas sing, constant as clocks that tell of something passing. Let it.