1980

I Watched a Snake

Jorie Graham

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2626

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
I Watched a Snake · Jorie Graham hard at work in the dry grass behind the house, catching flies. It kept on disappearing.

And though I know this has something to do with lust, today it seemed to have to do with work. It took it almost half an hour to thread roughly ten feet of lawn, so slow

between the blades you couldn’t see it move. I’d watch its path of body in the grass go suddenly invisible only to reappear a little further on,

black knothead up, eyes on a butterfly.
This must be perfect progress where movement appears to be a vanishing, a mending of the visible by the invisible—just as we stitch the earth,

it seems to me, each time we die, going back under, coming back up . . .
It is the simplest stitch, this going where we must go leaving a not unpretty pattern by default. But going out of hunger for small things—flies, words—going because one's body goes. And in this disconcerting creature a tiny hunger, one that won't even press the dandelions down, retrieves the necessary blue-black dragonfly that has just landed on a pod . . . all this to say I'm not afraid of them today, or anymore

    I think. We are not, were not, ever wrong. Desire is the honest work of the body, its engine, its wind.

    It too must have its sails—wings in this tiny mouth, valves in the human heart, meanings like sailboats setting out over the mind. Passion is work that retrieves us, lost stitches. It makes a pattern of us, it fastens us

    to sturdier stuff
    no doubt . . .