Knock, listen The harsh fly shines The beetle rubs out of its casing The brown butterfly with its fringe of blue eyes in a halo of purple probing fluttering over the fallen yellow maple leaves The drip of dry leaves before my eyes The trees grown tall remembering the words of the authors The pine red hair falling like new catkins on the leafless twigs The human hand touching everywhere— lifts and stirs like slow wings

It is this way the work builds as if someone had my hand, walked before me, gently drawing me the effort, silence these are the very lines of it almost as if fleshless blank simple, as if old or very young; I follow simply so caught, buoyed by fragility . . . so slight I lie down in the sun, my back against the dry warm log bridging the stream the sun in the stream lights. Woodpecker, brittle like the paper leaves spiralling down, brushing against tree bark the late thrush fluffed round seen only by the life of his eye, then seen all The balance of these words falling again and again against and upon the sentence barely breathing
The thrust of life within into the world, gathering the world

Why have the creatures come to our door hungering for bread? Why does the amber light in the soul of the dog speak love, when he has no words? They come to us

They wait endlessly for us, following our motions, but our children run on ahead, or lag in their world, our voices are filled with warnings, urgings

Being born with the world

The tensions are here

Now I see myself making the stars. Within me I hold a vast sky stars streaming out as if brushed by the wind from a star and I see them more and more and I can count them by their names for as many names as I can name to my content, to my exhaustion of all my yearning. They do not fall and fall open like flowers from a tree—shadows floating, catching light, spinning out—or wings that carry seeds, or fluffs that whirl endlessly. These stars are the stars of all my desire From their desire, from their eyes looking forward to me. My face in theirs, my voice, I meet them, here here here

Where is my body falling, quick, catch it! Shadow like the others . . . run, catch it flying on the wind, black smudges over snow . . . There, the glints, sun motes against the blue . . . No higher, the butterfly beating beating in a rare wind; no, there . . . lights broken in the face of a stream . . . here; no there, my small daughter running to me

The teachers of my child have forgotten memory have already hidden from my child her story

They didn't listen for it she did not hear it leave her lips

Seeking, I asked her for it She turned away, her mouth sealed over her deepest desires She seizes them with her hands, they work in her strong fingers

Who has lifted the pen!
Who has made the mark of the human face upon the page!
Who has seen here the invisible dictation!
I, just having taken it up, finding my life . . .

I stand here. I have arisen—into the dazzling, the different as if jumping, each time feeling the hands won't be there

But I am so small. This . . . this calling, this searching, this one come again and again to a place drawn here by this thread—

It is utterly difficult utterly simple, like a new language the wings of the old beating, beating How can the journey be of words, sentences?

Is that how it is when the universe comes into us, accepting our smallness using our eyes looking at the autumn blue, autumn branch, thickening pond light

comes into our ears to our darkness resists our fingers is that how the universe is content, when we can no longer think it but return to our simple duties, of dishes, of picking up, of being the earth as our children lean into us, of being worshipful to a dog who grows thin from not running of coming to you, my dearest, given silent understanding working in the terrors to come working in a love that had no words before this
