Endurance

Carolyn Forché

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2697
In Belgrade, the windows of the tourist hotel opened over seven storeys of lilacs, rain clearing sidewalk tables of linens and liquor, the silk flags of the non-aligned nations like colorful underthings pinned to the wind. Tito was living. I bought English, was mistaken for Czech, walked to the fountains, the market of garlic and tents, where I saw my dead Anna again and again, hard yellow beans in her lap, her babushka of white summer cotton, her eyes the hard pits of her past. She was gossiping among her friends, saying the rosary or trying to sell me something. Anna. Peeling her hands with a paring knife, saying in your country you have nothing. Each word was the tusk of a vegetable tossed to the street or a mountain rounded by trains with cargoes of sheep-dung and grief. I searched in Belgrade for some holy face painted without hands as when an ikon painter goes to sleep and awakens with an image come from the dead. On each corner Anna dropped her work in her lap and looked up. I am a childless poet, I said. I have not painted an egg, made prayers or finished my Easter duty in years. I left Belgrade for Frankfurt last summer, Frankfurt for New York, New York for the Roanoke valley.
where mountains hold the breath of the dead between them and to each morning a fresh bandage of mist.
New York, Roanoke, the valley—
to this Cape where in the dunes
the wind takes a body of its own and a fir tree comes to the window at night, tapping on the glass like a woman who has lived too much.
_Piskata, hold your tongue_, she says.
_I am trying to tell you something._