Each Bird Walking · Tess Gallagher

Not while, but long after he had told me, I thought of him, washing his mother, his bending over the bed and taking back the covers. There was a basin of water and he dipped a washrag in and out of the basin, the rag dripping a little onto the sheet as he turned from the bedside to the nightstand and back, there being no place on her body he shouldn’t touch because he had to and she helped him, moving the little she could, lifting so he could wipe under her arms, a dipping motion in the hollow. Then working up from the feet, around the ankles, over the knees. And this last, opening her thighs and running the rag firmly and with the cleaning thought up through her crotch, between the lips, over the V of thin hairs— as though he were a mother who had the excuse of cleaning to touch with love and indifference, the secret parts of her child, to graze the sleepy sexlessness in its waiting to find out what to do for the sake of the body, for the sake of what only the body can do for itself.
So his hand, softly at the place of his birth-light. And she, eyes deepened and closed in the dim room.
And because he told me her death as important to his being with her, I could love him another way. Not of the body alone, or of its making, but carried in the white spires of trembling until what spirit, what breath we were was shaken from us. Small then, the word holy.

He turned her on her stomach and washed the blades of her shoulders, the small of the back. “That’s good,” she said, “that’s enough.”

On our lips that morning, the tart juice of the mothers, so strong in remembrance, no asking, no giving, and what you said, this being the end of our loving, so as not to hurt the closer one to you, made me look to see what was left of us with our sex taken away. “Tell me,” I said, “something I can’t forget.” Then the story of your mother, and when you finished I said, “That’s good, that’s enough.”
