1981

Helios and Athene

H. D.

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2713
Helios and Athene · H.D.

Athens, 1920

1

The serpent does not crouch at Athene’s feet. The serpent lifts a proud head under the shelter of her shield.

The serpent is marked with pattern as exquisite as the grain of the field-lily petal. He is hatched from an egg like the swan.

The baby Ion, son of Helios, was deserted by his mother. She laid him among violets. Athene, the goddess, sent serpents to protect him. These serpents fed the child with honey.

When Helios the god slays the serpent, he slays in reality not so much the serpent, as fear of the serpent. The god learns from the serpent. Be ye wise as serpents.

The serpent lifts a proud head beneath the massive shield-rim of Athene, guardian of children, patron of the city.

On one of the remote altars of Demeter at Eleusis, is a serpent carved beautifully in high bas-relief.

The Eleusinian candidate, it is thought, at one stage of initiation, walked through a black cave, the retreat of snakes.

The mind may learn, though the body cringes back.

Consider the birds. Be wise as serpents.

In Athene’s hands is a winged creature, a Nike, her own soul.

Consider the birds. Consider your own soul.
The naked Greek, the youth in athletic contest, has set, accurately prescribed movement and posture. This convention made of him a medium or link between men in ordinary life and images of Pentallic frieze or temple front. We gaze upon this living naked embodiment of grace and decorum. We are enflamed by its beauty. We love it.

When we have exhausted the experiences of personal emotion, we gain from the statue the same glow of physical warmth and power.

The statue of Helios on the Olympic frieze, as the beautiful personality that once charmed us, acts as a go-between.

The youth is a link between men (let us say) and statues.

The statue is a link between the beauty of our human lovers and the gods.

The statue enflames us. Its beauty is a charm or definite talisman.

Our minds can go no further. The human imagination is capable of no further expression of beauty than the carved owl of Athene, the archaic, marble serpent, the arrogant selfish head of the Acropolis Apollo.

No individual has created beauty like this. No country or individual ever will.

But the Hellene did not throw down his chisel and rest in self-complacent admiration.

His work began when his work was finished.
The priest at Delphi, the initiate, even the more advanced worshipper, began his work where the artist ceased his labour.

The statue was like a ledge of rock, from which a great bird steps as he spreads his wings.

The mind, the intellect, like the bird rests for a moment, in the contemplation or worship of that Beauty.

The mind grips the statue as the bird grips the rock-ledge. It would convince itself that this is its final resting place.

The mind, in its effort to disregard the truth, has built up through the centuries, a mass of polyglot literature explanatory of Grecian myth and culture.

But the time has come for men and women of intelligence to build up a new standard, a new approach to Hellenic literature and art.

Let daemons possess us! Let us terrify like Erinyes, the whole tribe of academic Grecians!

Because (I state it inspired and calm and daemoniacal) they know nothing!
It was in Helios' heart to break, in Athene's not to be broken.

So Delphi and Athens stood, existent, gaining power, gaining strength, through inter-dependence of hatred.

But this hatred was clear, defined, removed from any hint of personal intrusion, intellectual, abstract.

If Athene's citadel broke, Helios' temple crumbled. If Helios yielded to her, Athene herself was undone.

Delphi and Athens were thus allied forever.

Delphi, the serpent, the destructive heat, Delphi the devastatingly subtle seat of oracles, Delphi whose centre of religion was a centre of political intrigue, Delphi the lie, the inspiration, the music, found in Hellas, in the world, one equal: Athene.

Athene with silver line between eye-brow and ridge of helmet could look with all the concentrated power of her eyes and leave unscathed no God in the world but one: Phoebus of Delphi.

The olive, turned from sombre gray to trembling silver by the wind, sweeping from the snows of Pentellicus, the imperishable silver of her helmet, the serpent whose belly shone silver as she lured him by her daemoniac power to lift his head from the black grass; the white silver of the olive leaf, the white belly of the serpent were as her guarded eyes.

To Helios alone could she open wide their splendour.

He hated her because she stood unconquerable: he loved her as an equal.
We cannot approach her direct, so abstract, so cold, so beautiful.

We approach her, if at all, through the medium of the Mysteries and through the intercession of other Gods.

At the foot of the Acropolis, as a lover, waiting at the feet of his Beloved, is the theatre of Dionysius.

The Greek Drama, the outgrowth of the worship of Dionysius, is a means of approach to Athene.

The greatest Athenians of the greatest period were initiates of the Eleusinian mysteries. Those great mysteries were protected by the Love of Athene.

The Love of Athene is symbolized by the arch of wings, for Demeter by the cavern or grot in the earth, and for Phoebus by the very essential male power. Love for Athene is the surrender to neither, the merging and welding of both, the conquering in herself of each element, so that the two merge in the softness and tenderness of the mother and the creative power and passion of the male. In her hand is the symbol of this double conquest and double power, the winged Nike.

The winged Nike, the white sea-gull, the imperturbable soft Owl, the owl, whose great eyes search the night, the mind, the dark places of ignorance.

Athene, the maiden, Parthanos, is doubly passionate.