Where they stay now, sun-bathe outside the hotel,
the resort pool is pure as a new playing card.

The air, straight off the glacier’s anaesthetic height, seems newly minted, the light unsullied as the first light that ever was.
If they still bear the bruised tattoo of the years they were married, you will not see it, nor will they find yours. Everyone is pretty.

They recognize a traveler, their smiles approve you.
And as their lotus gaze tours you, you can let it perform whatever surgery you need—excise the landmarks in your face, delete all the reasons held custody in your eyes, remove your badges, undress you quickly, expertly, by seeing nothing, by denying the damage—making less of you and less, mending you in the only way there is left.
