Kate and John

He saw the card- and domino-spots.
She heard the bid-calls.
Together they made a respectable player at Hearts and at Moon and at Forty-two.
After nightlong games
and John’s loud stories of a Texas without TV
—or me—
I’d be kept from sleep under Kate’s quilts, sweaty from imagining a world what if I’d never been born into?
On their last Christmas together,
their kids,
grand-
and great grandkids chipped in a dollar each and bought them color TV.
She
—who was almost blind from years of quilting—wanted him to go on and on about what she couldn’t see.
He
—who was hard, or tired, of hearing—would trust her to whisper what the pictures said into his ear.

Together, they almost always got the whole thing wrong.

Except for one ten o’clock when I sat between them on their sofa quilt and heard and saw
their reconstruction of a news story:
a tankcar
unloading hydrogen at a sidestation erupted in slow motion and burned.
Whoever was filming from a hillside didn’t survive.
But the camera kept reporting
—green sky green sky green—somersaulting silently down the grass slope, focusing, finally, on a cloud.
“Filmcrew” and “implosion” and “microphone”
sounded odd from Kate’s mouth and odder applied to the oranges and bright blues shared by John.
But the one whose job and world had gone on alone could’ve been described simply with a small, sad word that —brushing each a shoulder to one of mine—John kept from Kate and Kate from John.
