1985

Next-Door Neighbors

Debra Allbery

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
we rode a toy train among life-size replicas of brontosaurus and triceratops.

In winter the bean field behind our house would freeze over, and I’d skate across it alone late evenings, sometimes tripping over stubble frozen above the ice.

In spring the fields turned up arrowheads, bones. Those slow-plowing glaciers left it clean and flat here, scraping away or pushing underground what was before them.

Next-Door Neighbors

Grant Street was one long Sunday afternoon in February or March, a few yards of brown grass thinning and matted or rubbed away hard. Our house stayed dark with my mother’s pleurisy, and it made me angry, the way she kept trying to raise herself up to clean rooms or fix supper. Then she’d lie down again on the couch, covering herself tight with two blankets, chilling.

It was Sunday afternoon, foggy, and my father was playing his Hank Williams record. He’s dozing at the end of the couch, his hand on my mother’s feet, and I go outside to sit on the porch. Mr. Carter from across the street pulls up grinning on his Harley and asks me if I want to take a ride, and I do, but I don’t like his eyes, and besides I’m not allowed to, and shake my head no. I’m ten or eleven with a younger brother and sister somewhere, but my seeing is short-ranged and telescoped—cardboard taped into the Carters’ front window, the busted taillight on our old white Comet, yesterday’s Register, “The World At Your Doorstep.”
Mrs. Carter appears in the broken-paned window, another black eye, and pulls down the blind.
My mother had called Mrs. Carter to ask if she'd come over and blow cigarette smoke into her ears, she'd read somewhere that it helped. But Mrs. Carter said sorry, she couldn't leave the house. I'd yelled at my mother then why didn't she go to a doctor, I slammed the door and was sorry. Now I'm sitting on the step, biting the polish off my nails. I don't like my coat, it's reversible and has imitation fur. The snow edging the empty street looks like coal. Next year Mr. Carter will go to the electric chair for killing an old man and his wife and hiding their pieces in his car trunk. One night I'll forget to kiss my father goodbye before he drives off to the factory with just one taillight working, and I'll shudder to sleep seeing that, certain he'll die. I pray for goodness and mercy every night, I want too many things.

Dream Near Extinction

I'm sitting in the gravel road that leads to my grandmother's, moving my bare feet in a basin of dust soft as talc.

It's late afternoon. The wind is slow and laced with the tar my grandmother is cooking, stirring in a rusted barrel down by the house.

The tough grass clumped along the road has dried stiff and sharp as razor blades. A milk snake bellies through it blind.