1985

Intimate Lighting

James Frazee

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3254

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
the indolent wind picks through the treetops, the dusk flicks on the streetlamps, a church bell appeals over rooftops, and I sit in the dark with my elastic kind of laughter, resilient and true, the harder it pulls forward as a man, the harder it falls back as a boy.

Intimate Lighting

After the last house lamp is switched off and the wet emerald glow of the city night intrudes between the parted draperies, the living room assumes a less familiar shape and draws us into what the mind regards a darker and more indelible world.

To you by now, your abortion today should bring on hot blinding light, a white noise like traffic in gridlock, or perhaps a warning from God, the Bible falling from the bookshelf. But it is quiet. There is only a tinny sound in your head, not the ringing of ears, not the taunting rasp of lost motherhood, just that you feel nothing.

On the green grounds of the clinic I had circled a man-made pond which was like a window into a womb but where nothing seemed to move. While you lay under anesthetic I thought of why we are drawn to water, that its clear pacification is a kind of sham we don’t avoid because of its other-worldliness: the link between floating inside our mothers and evolving millions of years from the muck. But this is half of what I wanted to say, the half that let me be stunned when a crow in one graceful swoop picked clean with its beak a sliver of a fish and flew off unshaken in its flight.

What is the resolution of a life gone forever
if what it was wasn't meant to be?
What kind of dignity can be salvaged
when death nears the whisk of a hand?
I drape the window, ending the intimate lighting and motion you to the bedroom.
There is a sharp breathy sound
I've never heard before, a barren laughter imperceptible from weeping.
How clear it is. And ceaseless.

WOMEN IN BLACK

In Alicante, during the Semana Santa festival, you sat alone in a crowded maison, drunk and purple-lipped from table wine, staring out at the dim esplanada—the yellow and blue mosaic walkway, a topiary garden—green elephants, by a trick of light, that seemed to trudge trunk to tail. Women dressed in black bearing lit white candles and rosaries walked behind a mile-long parade where flashbulbs strobed as randomly as fireflies, where strolling Easter choirs competed like two stations playing on the same radio, where the pink and white flowered floats of Christ icons perfumed the air they wheeled through. In the bay, small fishing boats had lights strung to their masts.
From the ceiling of the maison hung cured haunches of ham, chorizo, blocks of headcheese, sausages that gave off a charred smokehouse odor. A thick cigarette haze stung your eyes and your wine glass once touched your lips by surprise, as though it moved involuntarily.