1985

Beyond Lorca

James Frazee

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3256

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
and you did nothing but just stand there, gazing out at the bay where cross-shaped lights over the fishing boats blinked on and off.

BEYOND LORCA

“A dead man in Spain is more alive as a dead man than anyplace else in the world,” Lorca said, and that “throughout the country everything finds its final, metallic value in death.”
It seems he became the astringent spirit of his words, the harsh incantatory trill of deep song, but I could only pretend I felt his words, much less, believed them until I lived in Spain thirty-six years after he was shot in the olive grove at Fuente Grande. I had been touring the Alhambra and Generalife in August, and had descended the exhaust-choked hill to the Hotel Washington Irving where lorries took the Cuesta de Gomerez trek in 1936 with men trussed like pigs, to be shot in Granada cemetery.
I walked along this treeless street under two o’clock sun, one of those almost shadeless afternoons made famous in the middle novels of Hemingway, with the heat knifing through awnings and shuttered windows, and everyone at siesta, napping at home or cooling off in sawdust-floored bars like La Pajarera, where thirsty, I dipped in for a beer.
No one swapped more than puffs of words at this hour; there was the matching of dominoes, the pinging ricochet of pinball, the near passiveness of mass silent prayer.
Behind me a gypsy girl, no taller than my waist, gyrated a red hula hoop chirping Americano tonto, so I walked out and sat in the shade of a wall edged with bottle shards.
Across the street, a bombed-out stone building, a church, forsaken since the war, waded in dusty sunlight.
An uncollared Doberman threaded between its torn iron grille and shattered entablature and hewn beams with the ease of familiarity, its tongue wagging, its ribs countable.
I chewed a toothpick while the dog squatted reflexively and let out a stream of piss over a skeletal windowframe, a stained glass of Christ with the halo still intact.
Two blocks down, the Civil Guard, Franco’s peace keepers, whistled down alleys and tested storefront locks as the sun flecked off their black patent leather caps, their spit-shined knee-high boots, the blue gun metal of their sub-machine guns.
The street, otherwise abandoned, was even without cars and the lugubrious Spanish pop songs on radios duelling window to window. As the two Civil Guard neared the church—they must not have seen me across the way—I watched them almost pass but heard two metallic clicks—their safety locks switched off—and standing, I saw them aim their guns toward the church, squint through sights, and shoot such an interminable round of fire that it effaced the dog, obliterated it except for a black tuft of its hair which floated horribly up and away even in that seemingly windless day. The Civil Guard laughed together, looking at that single tuft of hair until they heard me say Jesus Christ, and eyed me keenly, brushed by their guns, and laughed again, walking off in unison, smoke rising neatly behind their shoulders.

THE LAUGHTER OF BOYS

The laughter of boys lights up after school on the black asphalt parking lot near my apartment picture window.
It is the cackle of a bonfire, but a fire that crackles over a stack of green logs, a sound that comes from so far in I can’t remember when it left.
And when I watch the boys flick lit matches at each other and dodge the bites of the yellow-blue flames that hiss out on the ground like innocence,