The Cover of Mars

Jane Miller
Two Poems · Jane Miller

THE COVER OF MARS

The Lucille Ball—Dezi Arnaz hour concludes with a Fix beer slipping my neighbor's grip. Again he will sleep on the cot in the vestibule under a pile-up of stars. Now he shouts at his ignorant self in Greek, and his wife. Now that I am returned from the taverna like change from an empty, in the unutterable calm that cannot penetrate me, as the consonants and vowels of the Athenian newscaster cannot, in my brain, cohere, as the aggrieved, unformed mercies on a ward cannot, nor the white ships beyond the plaka, nor the dead flowers in my brain this overheated season in a rented room, neither assisting nor resisting you at your father's deathbed, all this aside, dressed in drag in long white skirt, a woman unmanned, I lie in the amphitheatric vibrations of the alphabet of international report & arthritic snore pelting the strip of beach invisibly like moon drag, white on white on decanted white forever, having wandered out of three ouzos with dinner, wondering whether peace with the Turks lasts because war with one another continues mentally, calibrated astronomically, whether people's hearts are too sore to care to reclaim territory, or whether I have not listened nor lived in such a way that I can understand a strange country's fate, let alone my own, wracked with mosquito at this juncture of adult love, face to face like a pomegranate to a peach the size of a melon, notwithstanding the moon, the problem that we are not permitted together, anthropomorphically assigning qualities a karpoozi sold off a truck could care less for, from this as from any altar, better than from the shot of morphine the doctor administers the last time I freak, cramped, I can blame myself in your presence & claim this room never had to do with my life, someone’s rotten smiling teeth above an undershirt like sailboat mirrored upside-down in sea, lit in the courtyard by the cerebral cortex of ultrablue cable television, Lucille in flames, addressing Ethel’s willing slow-take, the enormous wash-out of beach, weed, sea, sea, & sea, so that I can remember my center, backyards of beautiful barns & junked cars, the America I lose you in when we return, with precision, & with my usual splash as from outer space, years later, alone, I land up on a given afternoon crossing the Mississippi into Galesburg, Illinois, through Carl Sandburg Drive, past cemented Penney’s, singing down Main with the church bells of an historic cyclone, as one remembers an old life lifted from an old notebook, as obvious as our souls drifting the coast off Mars or worse, your face on the cover of Mars.
I give you back my heaven. You’re all in my head.

Race Point Polaroids

Rather than bear the farthest touch, rather than be rain, having been neither of this world nor mad, as it turns out, on and off during a year I saw someone had bitten your neck near the baby hair, and also your shoulder. Why does it show,