Victor

A farmhouse left to high glass. Clapboard grey-white as wind-scoured bone.
The mouth of the doorway,
the eye of one window battered shut. So many stories gibbering in and out of this empty head like shadowy small birds.

We see it at 186,000 miles a second, the speed light travels from even a vanished star. Victor out back in his vegetable garden. His raked and stained fedora. Scrubbed knuckles of young potatoes bubbling up under his hoe.

His woman calls him into the fading house for supper, the spider by her window riding out the wind in its harness of silk, light in the trees coming and going.
But Victor stays, watching the bright air of evening rain down, bloom, fill.
