Perspectives on Moving Backwards

Julia Mishkin
Perspectives on Moving Backwards · Julia Mishkin

There’s no smell like the first cigarette your father lights in the car near the middle of the George Washington Bridge; the man you pass stares at the sky as if the color blue were everything.

How can you doubt it when your own street is thick with houses, blue as bottles washed up by waves . . .

The air hangs limply like a tern too far inland, but when you lift a rock from the ground

there’s only the ground, the man on the bridge,
his wife nodding from shore like a broken doll;

when it’s time to go back to the roses stretching their thin necks, the dead grass lining the gutters, already your house detaches itself and swings along the ground, further than oceans

or the next blue continent.
Look out the back window:

you see how everything will leave you, the telephone poles chained together, the geese racing backwards, the sun dawdling into the nearest window.
Even the man on the bridge backs away.

And how the smoke turns blue in your father's mouth, that fragrance wrapped round you like a scarf!