1986

Notes from the New World

Carol Potter

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3393 I've seen how the water climbs up to work at the keel, how it eases the boat off its landing. I've seen the boat tilting unattended on the lake, oars in the oarlocks, the whole thing tipping this way and that against log, stone, and breakwater.
How the wind holds it in place while the lake kneads it and rocks it stem to stern against shore plucking small bits from the bow. I'm afraid someday I'll be out there rowing across the black gloss at dusk, listening to the loons, content, thinking this is all I need, when I'll hear some other kind of sound: water between the gunnels, my blue boat swinging open like a door.

NOTES FROM THE NEW WORLD

We went on talking into the dark.
We were saying the same words over and over. Like children trying to speak underwater, I thought if only I enunciated, if only I shouted that word a little bit better, you would lift into the air yelling, "I got it!
I got it!" We were talking into the dark as if there were a phrase we hadn't come to yet, one last word to make us understand. Yesterday, I watched a horse gallop up to a fence, halt, buck, and wheel back the other way again and again, as if finally, the intention refined, the fence would fall. Granted, in 1492 the sailors sailed up to the edge of the earth and discovered the earth had no edge after all. I imagine them clinging to the rails, shutting their eyes and laughing when they found themselves floating instead of falling.

113
They went on sailing.
We went on talking. “A little farther,” you said, and I went on.
We ran our hands along the seam.
You stared at me thinking if only you looked hard enough, it would all come clear.
I walked out.
I came back.
You said, “Let’s talk about it.”
We went on talking.
It was as if we thought we lived in some other world, a world where when lungs fail, the people learn some other way to breathe.
Imagine, in need of air, your hands opening up to do the work your lungs have ceased to do.
I would hold my new hands up into the light. I would place them against my ears and listen to the air lacing in and out of the web between my fingers. Imagine how careful I’d be carrying those new hands wherever I went.

Bay Mare in a Second Floor Bedroom

In my dream of the last day, a large bay horse followed me into my house and up the stairs.
The horse stood quietly behind me as I gathered my possessions: ice-cream bars, cigarettes,