1987

The First Drink

Maureen Seaton

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3517
The night swells around us.
Our voices, tense with lightning,
create a new silence.
Tree frogs surrender their bows, crickets hush. Your shadow emerges among the fireflies, soft-edged, reflecting the moon.
I start, as if seeing you for the first time, ask myself:
Who's the arrow and who's the swan?

THE FIRST DRINK

My mother stands in the doorway, always leaving. She thinks I'm a woman. Her face shows this—how odd. I'm four years old or less. The scene: Grandma’s kitchen, my father, his lap, me.
The choice: him or her. My heart empties soundlessly. I need her but she never touches me.
The kitchen seems to shrink when she leaves like some hot air balloon dying.
Objects take on life like that:
street signs, trees. I hear everything scream. I'm careful with everything.
The piano hurts when I touch it.
The glass angel feels lonely when I leave the room. I can't bear the cries of animals or babies.
I'm seven years old, careful not to crease my communion dress or bite the body of Christ. When they say the word sin, I believe them.

Late October: I bleed for the first time, ruin my Halloween costume.
I want to lay my head in my father's lap, absorb his equilibrium, but he thinks I'm a woman now, screams at me to cover myself. His fear is an undertow that drags him away. The years grow between us like bad children.

I spend reckless weekends before an eternal candle and gilded wafer they call God, starve my flesh to fine points, hard planes.
At sixteen, the first drink goes down like a flame: purifying, hot.
I feel the answers flood my toes, the promise seize my brain like sunlight in a corner of hell.