Louanne and the Pack of Kents

Aedan Alexander Hanley

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3767

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Two Poems · Aedan Alexander Hanley

LOUANNE AND THE PACK OF KENTS

I was thirteen when I had my first butt. Robin, this milker, turned me on to Kents. I’d lime her barn for money and cigarettes, then walk five miles for a pack. Barefoot down the cracked-up road, pressing tar bubbles with my heels, I’d pass this old Coldspot freezer smoking fish out its sides, and this horse, Patches, who hung with the cows because he thought he was a cow. Taking the bend on HWY. J, then five steps up to Braumshreiber’s general store, with its wooden floor and fake front like a Hollywood movie, I stood in the doorway, looking down. The long aisle, to its meringue ceiling and lobby lights, lit a butcher’s face, his waxy mustache dulled by yellow haze, and white apron bloody with guts from Patsie Sheffen’s old bull. My front tooth missing, shorts to my knees, and hair combed flat against my face, I’d ask for a pack of Kents. Louanne ran the register. “Are you old enough?” she’d say. Louanne was big. Breasts to her waist, blond hair shorter than a fly’s, and a sunburn around her raveled elastic swimsuit.
She'd throw me a pack and buy me a cone just so it would look good. I'd sit where the old-timers in clean pressed bibs watched trains, eat my cone, smoke a butt, and listen for the old Chessie to squeal through town, drowning out the smell of cows.

A WOMAN BY THE MISSISSIPPI

Her expression is nothing to look at. You would think er her occasional pats of the water, the rippled buildings reflecting, boats and people thinning out with each wave was a romantic thing, but it isn't.

The Mississippi is like a fat slug.
Its surface images of thin, rheumatic couples holding hands edge the river, and break the sand—slurry crabs hide their faces, distorted, tinged in the dirty light.

The river isn't beautiful today.
Its brown mouth spits up estones along the shore, the pitted ones layered on layers of smooth snail and crab shells.
And only the weepy tree at the river's back waves over the water soft and green.