He says the chickens know more than we do about crickets and worms and the weather. They never drown in the rain by keeping their mouths open.
They are simply offering their bodies to God and, sometimes, He takes them.
At least, He takes their small feathery souls above all that man has slaughtered, rising, like the dew
after a hot rain, to their small ignorant heaven.

FROZEN HARVEST

A sudden cold shakes the timber. Iced branches fall along the driveway like Grandpa’s hair.
After a wet spring

comes a wet harvest.
Nearly Christmas and the bins stay hungry for grain.
At last, the ground will hold us.
Soon, the combine will slide down the rows like a fat and aged dancer. This is the dream we keep having.

The banker smiling. Father restful in his sleep. But the window is full of fields, and the fields are full of beans—300 tons hanging gently from stalks so tender and so brittle, the burden of one bird would break them.

LEARNING TO DANCE

I

There used to be a horse in that pasture, a piebald gelding. He was the only way my father knew where to turn when he was visiting.

I remember baling hay there for the first time, before the horses, before the sheep, before my father ever thought to visit. The sun again close, our bodies wracked yet constantly in motion. Waves of grain in waves of heat. Our stomachs, the world, moving, our lives a song we were teaching ourselves to dance to.

II

Now it’s weeds,
now it’s beans,
now the old shed
is crumbling.
Sheep turn as the morning advances.
