1990

Useless Islands

Chase Twichell

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.3870 the bones asleep in the heat?
A vine like honeysuckle scribbles over the wall, one sweet taste on the pale green tip of each stigma, the delicately splayed petals spilling pale orange dust and perfume.

If I put my tongue to a single flower I'd suspend here forever in my unknown need, swaying like the black dog on his yellow bride, slightly off balance among the dead, locked in a dream.

Useless Islands

I'm trying to remember what happened when love overtook me, how the old self slipped from its hard boundaries like a ripe plum out of its skin.

It's a personal mystery.

It was August, each moment setting fire to the next,

the woods already bloodied by the first bright deaths.

I'm trying to remember, but there's a blacked-out part to the story, a steep, crashing wall of seawater, a long thrill of fear. I was dragged in an undertow as if out of sleep, and the blue-green light I swam toward was this paradise of islands, these green days spilled across a vast mercurial blue.

We lie in a flood of white sand under the broken prism of the sky, watching its fragile rays disappear down the secretive avenues of palms.

How long can we lie here?

The luminous charcoal and manila clouds cross like fish overhead.

His hand sleeps on my thigh.
The ratcheted voices of the tree frogs start up their random music, and we lie listening. It’s a way of passing more slowly through, of dragging a stick in the water like a brake. There’s the dull clop of goats on the red dirt road, and the lisp of the sand beneath us.

What the leaves were saying back in the other life, the palms are saying here.

It's the words to the long slow sad familiar hymn about the hourglass.

I lie beside my love in the silence between two waves, the grains of my body pouring.

I know that the second wave will ripen and fall. It will fall in a world that is emerald and sapphire, lit by the sparks of the sea. A world that will darken and abandon me.

WHY ALL GOOD MUSIC IS SAD

Before I knew that I would die, I lolled in the cool green twilight over the reef, the hot sun on my back, watching the iridescent schools flick and glide among stone flowers, and the lacy fans blow back and forth in the watery winds of the underworld.
I saw the long, bright muscle of a fish writhing on a spear, spasm and flash, a music violent and gleaming, abandoned to its one desire.
The white radiance of Perdido filtered down through the rocking gloom so that it was Perdido there too, in that strange, stroking, half-lit world.
Before I knew that love would end my willful ignorance of death, I didn’t think there was much left in me that was virgin, but there was.