1991

Negative Confession

William Olsen

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4034

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
NEGATIVE CONFESSION

I razor-slit three tick-sized hits of Emerald Pyramid
for five of us, and underneath a hair-line crack in the dusk, pure space had broken through with every dream we ever meant to be tincturing the fire-pond crimson.

One afterlife and the next seeping away, even the one called Shame. Phantasmal, unremembering, we all tried to act as if everything were normal, while the windowed end
of the world began again, a few last blackbirds thrown across the cornfields like something torn from earth, beyond our cool quiet
and the skeletal sycamores,
into the orphanage
called Twilight.

That October sunset looked us all spacy in the eyes and told us we would never die except to dread and wonder.

Twenty years later, if telling resurrects, then listen O my heart, for we did not want a peaceful afterlife.

In the Egyptian Book of the Dead at judgment the heart is placed on a brass balance
and weighed against the Feather of Truth.
This is when, if you are lucky, your heart refuses to testify against itself.

You never asked your servants to work past dawn,
  nor caught fishes with bait of their own bodies, nor set the homeless on fire.

You never cursed your past except in shame,
  to yourself.

I think I was afraid our best highest intentions
  wouldn't outweigh a feather.

We held in dead smoke till the seahorse exhalations swam around the Chinese lantern while the oaks,
  brazen with blackbirds,
  sang us down from heaven twenty years ago.

Their shadows threw themselves past us as if we were stubble.

  Where in the afterlife
  of saying so are my almost friends? O my deaf heart, why confess to you?

Could you ever
  lie for me, lay me down cold, lie down in a jar of wine and still refuse
  the safety of dying?