1991

Water Music

Joseph Duemer

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4059

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
WATER MUSIC

Gnats orbit my face as we float on our backs in the brown river, eyes closed or half-closed to the sun and building thunderheads.
We are trying to recover our luck by surrendering our bodies to the current. A current runs through everything, yes, but here it is explicit—we are far from the clean black beetles that do authority’s bidding, far from the toxicity of bank loans.
All we have is this chaos in our hearts.
And water trickling over the mossy lip of the dam down there as surely as money, or love, making an inhuman music on the jumbled rocks below.
A big turquoise dragonfly lights on a floating twig, freezes: it flexes its four wings so slowly I fall further into the world of dreaming. I think this may be one of those rare moments of transcendence.
Don’t you believe it. The dragonfly, though beautiful, is as inhuman as a jewel; its carapace is hard, its eyes compound—it must see in clicks and segments what we see as smooth and round; a live mineral, it needs this water to perpetuate its ancient genes, which we do on dry land, calling it by other names.
In love, we say, somehow wrapping our brittle bones around each other, swimming toward that music neither of us understands. Music like the jeweled clockwork of the sun-drenched dragonfly’s four perfect wings that flex the light. There is no secret in that light, no matter how beautiful, how full.

Dog Years

Well, in a hundred years when an army of blind crows scratches with scarred claws in the duff at the edge of the browning woods by the river; when new grasses tough as knotted rope have grown that have never heard the historical whisper of languages and the religions spawned thereby; when old trout burn huge and muscular near the bottom of the drunken river from which lush weeds coil;

    when no hammer blows fall like cold syllables in the heart of the village to ring the spring air and prick up the ears of old dogs sweltering on our porches;

when our dogs twitch their fine noses at the acrid combinations of leaf smoke and the cold burnings of fungus;

    when it is all over for us, even in this rural paradise