THE BISHOP DREAMS HE WAS A BRUNETTE IN PARIS IN 1860

I wash my silks out in a bowl, squeezing and pressing air like saliva through my slip. The mole on my cheek has grown and I have hair again. It’s loose and I hold a black lacquered barrette in my hand. Outside three women stand and point, their lips moving like squares sucked up from the mud. They are about me.
They are the chatterboxes unleashing a pledge of silence. Without me, they’d still spit the wine at dusk, a real curse to undo . . . The colporteur is peddling his saint cards today. His Mary rapt with attention. Martha with trays and quick snakes at her ankles. The other ladies without blemish.
I’ll invite him in to discuss his fondness for one more than the others, Theresa, or Joan? But he cannot say which: “Love goes like a tattered veil in all directions . . . and when I forget even one for a second . . .” It’s an atrocity? “Yes, something like flies attached to my hair cut, a hell of a shame.” Who then, what lags out there on the walk?
What nerve thrills the one with the painted pin on her hat, her greedy arm rivaling the branch for light. And the blue stickler for straight seams on her legs and eyes, a tongue with rungs to the red grass she stares down, my mother? to a knife? And the last one standing like a heave, flat to the wind, a poor board face, shoulders slumped as if loaded with horseshoes? All, me? Why is the room empty, and the dredges at the Ash gone to their afternoon pastries? I'm alone again at the marble foot, a softness in my fingers moist over his cold arch, up and around the toes searching again through bone for an influence, again for the hot, unlimited blood of supply.

Gravitational Masses in the Dream Way

Here the weather has just broken. Rain detailing the leaves across the sidewalk, ledger pages softening to meal with the spread of gasoline in the open street. I'm in a boat built by Chagall; it is red like the dress of the winter wedding guest or the chairs facing Lear in the stone theatre fifty feet below. Chagall himself is standing on the corner waiting for the light, the effulgent center to change. A netted sack of firm garden vegetables hangs over his shoulder, green and yellow peppers impinging, two drops of milk, one on each eyelid trickling down to the bones in his cheeks. I want to kiss him but the clouds are shifting and the hands behind
