CAR ALARM

It must have been the combination, the sunset plus the noise, that was so unnerving. Sirens, car and burglar alarms are nothing—they go off all the time.

They’re background music. This one yowled like a mechanical doberman from the new Mercedes.

The owner wasn’t home. Someone had already called the cops.

That’s all, yet half a dozen neighbors stayed outside milling around in the street because the sunset was so eerie, the pink and orange of a spreading fire with heavy green occlusions welling up above the roofs, like something burning and growing at the same time.

One minute I’m folding laundry and the next I’m standing on the front stoop under a sky that can’t be natural, and my heart is barking please please please tell me what to feel when everything I love—that I just this instant realize I love—blisters in the sudden radium of fear.
