Reply Without Gazelles

A month for funerals. Lightning strokes striking tenanted fields. Each Saturday we passed printed pamphlets, faces coming off on our hands:

Re Modise, seventy years a dark unpeeling. The sound of spoons.

Morning, one distant shot pierced the heart of—
No. Morning, we killed a bull for the funeral feast. Such a wide circle to feed. Relatives mud-streaking the windows to sign grief. Inside, the old story. The black-wrapped widow shaving children’s heads. Scalps flickering, smooth bones turning

a loose socket, blank new world, the too familiar room. What it’s like without. Women wake in the borrowed soldiers’ tent nursing candles. Men by the fire.

Separation. Small

lights in the night.

Cries of crowned plovers, this old habit of naming. *What's it like to wake to gazelles every morning tell me about Africa. There was this funeral. A lightning storm. An old man ploughing his field. First rains. Dry ground. Fallow rivers of termites.

I heard them digging the grave, the laughing pitched against stones. A pearl-spotted owl stuttering against thorns. A sound unidentified moving through the unelectrified night.

Morning turns with the shovel. Din of roosters. The sun in a tin basin, we washed off death at the gate each Saturday, how we ate and ate.
