1996

And Still It Comes

Thomas Lux

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4626

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
AND STILL IT COMES

like a downhill brakes-burned freight train full of pig iron ingots, full of lead life-sized statues of Richard Nixon, like an avalanche of smoke and black fog full of bent pins, the broken off tips of switch-blade knives, the dust of dried offal, remorseless, it comes, faster when you turn your back, now when you turn to face it, like a fine rain, then colder showers, then downpour to razor sleet, then egg-sized hail, fist-sized, then jagged laser, shrapnel hail thudding and tearing like footsteps of drunk gods or fathers; it comes polite, loutish, assured, suave, breathing through its mouth (which is a hole eaten by a cave), it comes like an elephant annoyed, like a black mamba terrified, it slides down the valley, grease on grease, like fire eating birds’ nests, like fire melting the fuzz off a baby’s skull, still it comes: mute and gorging, never to cease, insatiable, gorging and mute.