1996

The Way I'm Taught by Heart

Pattiann Rogers
Pattiann Rogers

THE WAY I'M TAUGHT BY HEART

The way I'm taught how to move my hand along the swelve and lank of your naked back is by having watched how a pine in easy wind smooths itself along the close spine of a summer night. The way I know how to drink at your mouth is by remembering my mouth at the earth once taking sweet spring water with my eyes closed.

I learn how to speak to you now by imitating the cholla blossoms who, in their hour, speak of lust and expiation, and I seek you in the same way the marblewings opening in dampness at dawn admit for their own edification every last probe of sun possible.

Rising and falling inside your arms, I understand how mosses and cress lose and gain over and over inside the hold of a stream. I've seen the headlong push forward of a trout nudging upcreek in a current.

Deep sea geographies of spiraling canyons and cols, sudden stellar-scatters and the chances beyond—these are the same words as the words of your body, your name, as I pronounce it, identical to wind-borne riflings of rain above desert light.

Here I am, like God, the pulsing center in a gather of waxwings widening and tightening in their flock against the sky, like God, a wayward thread of cottonwood lifting over fields, forswearing forever, all bones, every place.

CREATION BY THE PRESENCE OF ABSENCE: CITY COYOTE IN RAIN

She’s sleek blue neon through the blue of the evening. She’s black sheen off the blue of wet streets, blue daunt of suspension in each pendant of rain filling the poplars on the esplanade.

Her blue flank flashes once in the panes of empty windows as she passes.
She’s faster than lighthouse blue sweeping the seas in circles.

Like the leaping blue of flames burning in an alley barrel, her presence isn’t perceived until she’s gone.

She cries with fat blue yelps, calls with the scaling calls of the rag men, screeches a siren of howls along the docks below the bridges, wails with the punctuated griefs of drunks and orphans.