A Poem for Grandmother

Ranjit Hoskote
A Poem for Grandmother

A door. A stair. And two steps inside that dark, the straight-backed chair my grandmother sat in, a lace net draped across its mahogany arm. And on the table, a volume of stories open at the flyleaf, its tissue quill-scarred.

The photographs seal her in a shell of relations: the sepia corset would have her no more than an empress delegating domestic chores; in this room, imagine her gravely accepting tributes of porcelain and sparkling brass or setting tiger lilies afloat in bowls, or stocking pots of pickled mango in the attic of summer.

But the wrong word kills, and empress is wrong, an acrid graft on a delicate stock. Empire was never her creed: grandmother had to learn the principles of governance from practiced hands. She had to whet the brusque words of command on waspish crones in the inner courtyard, had to tame the peacocks in the garden and dry the raisins of tact with aunts-in-law, invalids who ruled from brass-bound chests and serene beds of illness.

She grew up with her children, kept house in a city of merchant ships and parade-ground strife, made a home in the rain-gashed heart of that world in whose lanes stowaway Chinamen sang the praises of their silk, and coolies peddled cartloads of spices plucked for colder ports. Like the poets of that city, she wrote in two languages, spoke a third in polite company, the lines enjambed over the trellises, the words trapped in porous stone.
She died giving birth to a daughter on Armistice Day, 1931. She grew into the earth, then, a storied fig tree whose roots shot to heaven and branches burrowed so deep they seeded a forest.

Giving consumed grandmother. Connected to her by nothing more substantial than a spiraled thread of protein, I wake some nights to find her eyes staring at me from the mirror: grandmother when she died, younger than I now am, cut in half by the streetlight’s glare.

Hoard your powers, she says, do not give from the core, my son, do not give. Giving spites the flesh, corrodes intention. Most unreliable of barters, most memorable of sins, giving kills. My son, do not, like Karna, rip off the armor that is your skin.

GROUP PORTRAIT

The afternoons shuttle by, slides in the magic lantern behind his eyes. Waking at teatime, he will neglect the flavor of mint, brush the sandwiches aside. First, he must compress his lore, replace each slide with the true chronicler’s unhurried finesse in its allotted tray. And as they fog, the old man wipes his half-moon lenses with the soft cloth of evening.